Pure precipitated lead is triturated with sugar of milk

General Action .- It produces general interstitial inflammation characterized by proliferation of connective tissue (nerve, muscle and parenchyma of organs) The most striking effects of lead appear to originate from its action on the spinal cord and the nerves proceeding from it, namely, colic with violent contraction of the intestines and abdominal parietes, obstinate constination Paralysis, attacking chiefly the flexors of the extremities and finally becoming general; terrific pains in the extremities The brain degenerates. epilepsy, various disturbances of the mental powers, even imbecility, result. Various organs undergo degeneration (sclerosis), kidney, heart, liver, etc
